Conservation of Lumber is War Necessity

There must be greater conservation and more efficient use of remaining lumber supplies because of the tight supply situation, says the USDA War Board. Labor shortage in lumber mills, transportation problems and war requirements restrict production for civilian use. The use of new lumber materials and lumber substitutes is essential. In some cases depleted supplies are not adequate for emergency needs.

There are three avenues of relief:

1. Substitute materials available locally whenever possible such as salvaged lumber and other building materials. Also substitute types of construction which require little if any lumber such as rammed earth, adobe construction, pole or log construction, and temporary construction such as straw sheds.
2. Use more preservative lumber substitutes such as structural insulation boards and wallboards of other composition and roofing materials may often be substituted for lumber siding
